"Some time afterwards he appeared at Texarkana and began to make in quiries regarding the bad men of the town. Two or three lesser lights were named, but he did not warm up. One day, however, he saw a tan man with a rather wild look in his eye and he was a town to shoulets. But he said to himself that he was bold that he was Charley Dixon, the only real out and out bad man in the town. thing to his advantage turning up. He went to Simms' variety and finally got a dance with Simms' girl. He whirled her around in front of samme and made as much of an obnoxious display of himself as he could. It was no use. Simms was worried over the last shooting, and he was keeping quiet.

"Lucas came somewhat later to Dailas. He was walking down the street a few days after his arrival there, when he saw a big man with a revolver in his hand, and following him were four of five much interested individuals. He joined in the procession, and he saw that the big man, who was somewhat intoxicated, was dragging Guinocio's and straightaway he went there. He found Dixon at one of the stables playing poker. As a bird is fast cinated by a snake so Lucas kept revolving ground and aroung this table. At last one of the players threw down his hand and Dixon raked in a Jack pot. 'top,' yelled Lucas, that man has cheated,' and pointed to Dixon. 'He had an arce up his sleeve. I saw him.' Every person in the room stopped playing and crowded around Dixon, expecting to see a killing. Lucas threw back his head and stood with his eyes ablaze facing the bad man. Dixon looked at him in surprise ans covered him with his gun. Lucag gave a wild laugh and yelled, 'If you are such a h—of a fellow, why don't you shoot? That was too much for the crowd. Somebody caught Lucas by the arm and led him out of the place. The next morning, thoroughly disgusted, he shook the dust of Texarkana off his feet and went to look elsewhere for trouble.

"At Fort Worth Lucas landed from the train one' damp morning in the carly spring. I don't know where he came from or where he had bean and told him to drive him around some and to a twine string, a somewhat intoxicated, was dragging behind him, tied to a twine string, a somewhat intoxicated, was dragging behind him, tied to a twine string, a bid min totation, and he saw that the big man, whole was saying. "Since I am speaking of Court wright, I might add that he was killed by Luke Short not long afterwards and his death brought out a very fine point in gun play. He and Short were at a table playing cards; a dispute aroae, the lie was passed and the two reached for their guns. Both were experts and the man that drew first it was very evident, would be the only one that would live. Luke got his gun out first, shot his opponent's trigger finger before he could are and then having his man in his power, coolly put a builet through his heart.
